PREFACE

The treatment of alcoholism frequently involves the use of protective drugs such as disulfiram and calcium carbimide, which can provoke a potentially severe reaction when alcohol is consumed. Hence, it is important that physicians and pharmacists involved with patients receiving such pharmacotherapy be aware of the alcohol content of liquid pharmaceutical preparations, both prescription and over-the-counter, in order that they may offer appropriate advice with respect to product selection. In addition, patients may need advice regarding the use of alcohol-containing food additives and/or cosmetics.

In 1975 with this objective, the Pharmacy Service of the Clinical Institute, Addiction Research Foundation, compiled information on alcohol content for most liquid pharmaceutical preparations of the major companies, as well as several smaller ones whose products are distributed in Canada; also included in the listing was a limited number of cosmetic preparations.

In the succeeding years this compilation has been extensively used, both within this hospital and in various institutional and community settings; therefore, in the face of new products and changing formulations it was considered important to update the information.

The data have been tabulated as indicated in the following example:

Orthoxicol	Upjohn	nil	(1989)
(a)	(b)	(c)	(d)

The product name and manufacturer are listed in columns (a) and (b) respectively. In some cases an abbreviation of the manufacturer's name is used (see the List of Abbreviations). The ethanol content of the product expressed as a percentage v/v (except where otherwise specified) is presented in column (c). The year in which the information was verified is noted in column (d). Products have been classified according to therapeutic use, essentially according to the American Hospital Formulary classification. Data for oral and topical preparations are presented in Part I, for injectables in Part II, for food products in Part III, and for cosmetics in Part IV.

The cooperation of the contributing manufacturers, without which this publication would not be possible, is gratefully acknowledged.

The original edition was prepared by Naomi Hunchuk with contributions from a number of staff members of the Pharmacy Service. The present edition has built upon these original efforts.
